Dear Recruiter,

I am interested in the HTML Email Developer Co-op at JAM Direct, as advertised on waterlooworks. I am currently in my 1B term studying computer science at the university of waterloo and have taken additional courses outside of university in relation to computer science. I have always aspired to have a job involving programming and believe many of the skills I have learned throughout my years of taking these courses and creating side projects make me an ideal candidate for this role.

As a result of taking numerous computer science courses, I have grasped a good understanding of many software development skills and have been interested in and worked with HTML, CSS and JavaScript for many years. I also have experience working on web applications with a team through multiple hackathons and I always encourage feedback from teammates in order to improve everyone's skills. In addition to technological skills, I have excellent interpersonal communication skills and have taken an entire course devoted to interpersonal communication.

I believe my mindset makes me perfect for this role as I have always been a glass-half-full type of person who always looks at the positives of everything. In addition, I love learning new things and facing challenges to allow me to get the most out of everything I do. I am also very accountable and love to show confidence in my work. I always make sure to ask questions, work hard and have a high attention to detail in order to create the best product every time. I am prepared to work as hard as I can to prepare for this role and believe I am ready to excel.

I look forward to sharing more about myself in an interview and thank you for taking the time for reading this.

Sincerely,

Matthew Kanemy
